

The Bill of Rights are the first ten amendments of the Constitution. These amendments allow the American people to know and understand their rights and how they connect to the government. If I were to Propose a new addition to the Bill of Rights, it would be the right to affordable college education.

Lowering college tuition can have a positive impact on the percentage of yearly enrollment. By reducing the tuition, students will have less debt when they graduate. According to the American Council on Education, they stated in their article 'Putting college costs into context', in 2010, state and local support for general education operatives fell to a 25 year low in inflation- adjusted terms, while FTE enrollment increased by 61%. This shows that when tuition costs deplete, the enrollment percentile increases. Additionally, lower tuition can provide more access to higher education opportunities for students who may not have been able to afford it otherwise, increasing the number of college-educated individuals in the workforce and encouraging the development of a more educated and productive society.

Lower college tuition can help to reduce the total amount of loan debt for all students, since there will be less money borrowed overall. This can in turn help to reduce interest rates on student loans and make them more affordable for all borrowers. In 'The student loan debt statistics in 2018: a $1.5 trillion crisis.' Zach Friedman stated, there are more than 44 million borrowers that collectively have $1.5 trillion in student loan debt in the U.S alone. These statistics prove that as students are going to college, they are racking up millions of dollars in student loans for a higher education. Lower tuition costs would also allow students to focus more on their studies and less on working part-time jobs to cover their tuition costs. This could lead to higher graduation rates and better student outcomes. Finally, lower tuition costs would make college more accessible for students who may not have considered it an option due to the cost, playing back into yearly enrollment.

College education has been an integral part of America. It has a direct impact on the quality of life of citizens of the United States. Having a college degree is often associated with higher earning potential, better job opportunities, and greater financial stability. It serves to develop a person's intellect and provide them with the skills and knowledge to be successful in the workforce. If college education costs were to be lowered, the impact on citizens of the United States would be far-reaching. More people would be able to access higher education, allowing them to develop the skills needed to succeed in their chosen careers. This would lead to an increase in the number of qualified professionals, which could have a positive impact on the economy of the United States. With more educated professionals, the country would be able to attract more investments from businesses. Lowering the cost of college education would also allow more students to pursue their dream of higher education, and in turn, it would increase the number of graduates entering the workforce, thus providing more qualified labor for the job market. Lastly, lower college tuition costs would benefit the citizens of the United States in many other ways, such as providing them with more disposable income, reducing the cost of student loans, and allowing them to pursue their desired career paths. To conclude, the impact of lowering college tuition costs in the United States would be highly beneficial for the citizens of the country, and would have positive impact on the economy.