

One right from another country I would like to see added to the Bill of Rights is the right to a healthy environment. This right has gained more attention in many countries, like South Africa and Norway. It shows how environmental health is a big factor in a person's health, especially for people from backgrounds that are not represented. This right came from the demand for ecological justice and recognition for those who are already struggling economically and who are often hit hardest by environmental issues. In the U.S., acknowledging this right is crucial because of health inequalities, the worsening effects of climate change, the high costs of pollution, strong public support for environmental protections, and existing legal frameworks in various states. Adding the right to a healthy environment in the U.S. Bill of Rights would help citizens secure their health and well-being while motivating them to take better care of the environment. Many Americans want to protect the environment. Several states have taken steps to add environmental rights to their constitutions. If the right to a healthy environment were included in the U.S. Bill of Rights, it would help keep the United States' environment clean and safe for us and future generations.

Resources: Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). (2017). Environmental Justice. Retrieved from EPA Website

National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA). (2020). Climate Change: The Facts. Retrieved from NOAA Website

American Public Health Association (APHA). (2018). The Health Costs of Air Pollution. Retrieved from APHAWebsite

Gallup. (2021). In the U.S., Support for Environmental Protection Remains High. Retrieved from Gallup Website

New York State Constitution, Article 14. (n.d.). Retrieved from New York State Legislature Website